THE GOLDEN YEARS

by Todd V. Winder

Work as "a way of life" appeals to many seniors. 35,000 people responded to a survey of the American Association of Retired Persons. Money was cited as the most important reason for working by only 32 percent of those 62 or over. For 19 percent of those 62 or over, work itself is what they like. Others work to keep busy, to be with people, or to help others.

When residents of Pound Ridge, New York, prepared a public birthday celebration for Edith Waters, she commented: "I don't see why everyone is making such a fuss. Lots of people are turning 90 these days." But many people much younger aren't maintaining her pace. At the community library, where she has been a volunteer for 30 years, she's described as a "hard worker." She is active in her church where she is treasurer of the women's group, and she also transcribes books into Braille and delivers meals to shut-ins. "She has more energy than most 60-year-olds," says the church Secretary.

by Todd V. Winder

Demand keeps growing for child-care centers as more mothers remain in the work force, but reliable people are needed to staff the centers. Now senior citizens are being recruited -- as paid workers by some child-care chains and as volunteers in nonprofit centers. Child-care administrators observe that older people enjoy working with young children, and absenteeism is less of a problem than with younger workers. Says one director: The involvement of older people" . . .also had a positive effect on the young parents' attitudes toward aging."

Emmanual Zewerling still turns out now and then for meetings of the Jewish War Veterans post in Bloomfield, New Jersey. At 101, he is the oldest member of JWV nationally. Zwerling was wounded at Chateau-Thierry while serving as an infantry sergeant in World War 1. He had joined the New York National Guard in 1910 and a few years later saw active duty along the Mexican border, pursuing Pancho Villa. He retired from the New York City police force in 1946 as a sergeant.

Remember When? 1936 -- In the first election to the Baseball Hall of Fame, five alltime stars were inducted: Ty Cobb, Christy Mathewson, Honus Wagner, Walter Johnson and Babe Ruth.

London Springs Receives Top Survey

12 Oct 1988

London Springs Care Center recently completed it's annual survey by the Utah Department of Health and received the best survey on record for the facility in many years. Todd V. Winder, facility administrator, stated that to his knowledge, the recent survey is the best ever for the facility since it opened in the late sixties.

Each year long-term care facilities throughout the state are given an unannounced surprise survey by the Department of Health. The survey process is very strict and in-depth and last approximately three days. During the three days, all departments of the facility are inspected to assure that all state and federal regulations are being implemented in the facility. If the survey team finds the facility has any deficiencies in keeping the regulations, then the facility is given the opportunity to correct any deficiency within a designated time frame. There are also certain deficiencies that can result in fines, and in some cases, even closure of the facility.

The staff of London Springs are very pleased with the recent survey results. Mr. Winder made the comment that only a high quality staff can receive such a survey by the Department of Health. The survey proves that the staff and facility are of top quality and shows that the care being provided is of the best quality. Mr. Winder also noted that the recent survey easily rates the facility as one of the best long-term care providers in the state.

London Springs Care Center is continuing it's renovations and invites the community to drop in and see what's happening at the Care Center.

London Springs Care Center Passes Compliance Survey

Many people in our community have been aware that London Springs Care Center was scheduled for a compliance survey with a federal survey team from the regional offices of the federal government in Denver. A three member team arrived on Monday last week for a two day stay and evaluation. The administration of London Springs is pleased to announce the successful results of the survey findings.

The survey team found no deficiencies in their research through records and observation of care. The facility is pleased to have met the challenge of such scrutiny, but more that that, they are proud that their standard of patient care has been federally acknowledged as excellent.

The staff and residents are pleased with the success of the survey. Zero deficiencies found on a federal survey is an uncommon event. They wish to share their joy and pleasure with the community. Many thanks and appreciation go to those who made it possible.
